We gather'd there. A fairer, sweeter morn Ne'er glisten'd brighter on each fount and rill Than now was lingering. Thin fleecy veils Of silvery light that hung around the base Of mountain stern, like tender finger'd vouth Around the sturdier stock of vigorous age, Long since forsook their lawly bed and soar'd Away to other climes on tepliyr's wing. Naturo's lavish hand had strewn with bounty And the glad face of earth lit up with smiles. Lucy saw the opining eye of morn With wild unheeding glare. Fell disease had twin'd His long fingers around the vital chord And the warm flow of health departed. Long weeks of illness had claps d, and now 'Twas evident the ling'ring spark of life Was almost out. Her flying chariot Had almost gain'd its heav'nly mansion And she beheld this loathsome sphere of earth But a dark speck in Fane ,'s far distance. Hew dest thou love to statch the dearest gem That glitters on the dazzling coronet! How does thy withering touch Dark Spirit Blight the sweetest blussom and the fondest hope ! Ah t still'd now is the soul-inspiring lute And light the trembling step that seeks her couch, Hush'd are the strains of joy through the lone halls And fearful the low whisper that breaks upon

And while I look'd on her, methought her ashen Check grew paler, and the clear blue eyo That spoke her tenderness was dimmer; And as the gentle beaming eye of day Clos'd calmly o'er the scene, she mildly caught The last faint shadow of expiring light And whisper'd "Mother, I must go, "Never shall I behold your earthly sun "That shines in mockery and sets in clouds, "But I go where suns forever shine is of fauciess giory, fare thee well: "Adieu, my Sister, Brothers, Friends, farewell."

The death-like stillness 'round.

She cras'd, and swift from Heaven's throne 'The angel gladly sped, And placing soft his mighty arm Through space he upward fled. Now Relatives one tear allow For ties of nature riven.

But faint not at the Saviour's voice For Lucy is in Heaven. West Buckfield, Me.
